

What purpose does adding an additional pipeline for internet access provide that is not already covered by telephone circuits, satellites, or wireless portals? I can't think of a valid reason for redundancy for internet service, especially on a "power grid" already exposed to the elements of weather, and "controlled" by humans that have a hard time explaining massive multi-state blackouts.

Todd Butler
Urbandale, Iowa